About the Conference

The National Walking Summit is the premier opportunity for community advocates, nonprofit representatives, government officials, and transit, health, and planning professionals to share best practices, tell community stories, build support for the walking movement, and create momentum for the work ahead.

Since the first National Walking Summit, held in Washington, DC in 2013, the conference has emerged as the must-attend event for anyone working to increase walking and improve walking conditions. The National Summit has explored important topics such as the disparities facing communities across the US, creating accessible and inclusive spaces to be physically active, and expanding who is involved with walking and walkability to include transit, affordable housing, climate change, and many other sectors.

Reimagining the Future of the National Walking Summit

Issues related to walking and walkable communities start at the local level, with the strategies to create safer, more accessible, well-connected networks of mobility emerging from local efforts to shape communities into active, healthy, and engaged places. These efforts demonstrate that there is no one-sized fits all solution. Strategies that create safer walking environments are best when they reflect the history, culture, and background of each community.

With that in mind, America Walks has decided to take the opportunity to have the National Walking Summit refocus around geographic-based convenings that feature the unique characteristic of each place, highlight solutions from on the ground, and explore how communities are adapting national strategies to fit their needs. The lessons from these Summits will be shared with the national network of America Walks.

One of these National Walking Summits will be held in St. Louis, MO over the course of March 10-11, 2020 and will focus on the theme “Connecting Communities, Overcoming Barriers.” America Walks is working with a local planning committee to identify ways the meeting can help address issues related to health, safety, equity, inclusion, and more. The National Walking Summit-St. Louis will explore how walking and walkability connects communities to overcome barriers, bridge divides, and address inequities that exist because of legacies of injustices.

Local Success for National Change

The National Walking Summit-St. Louis will celebrate and showcase several local approaches that have been connecting communities and dealing with past racial tensions. These approaches will be offered as local solutions to our national challenges concerning the development of safe, accessible, equitable, and enjoyable places to walk and be physically active. America Walks will share the lessons and recommendations from the convening with a national network, inspiring action and creating change in communities across the US. Attendees of the National Walking Summit-St. Louis will learn valuable advocacy and communications skills and will come together to develop collective action plans for how to continue to connect communities and remove barriers.
